Silent Whispers

The carnival buzzed with life — strings of colorful lights swayed above, the air thick with sizzling oil, laughter, and distant music. Aahana moved through the crowd like a shadow, her hands buried in her hoodie pockets, eyes down. She didn't smile. Didn't frown. Just... walked. The world roared around her, but inside? Silence. Aahana wasn't sad. Not exactly. And she wasn't numb—no, not that either. She was... hollow in a way that settled deep beneath the skin, like cold water seeping into bone on a winter morning. You could see it in the way her shoulders curled forward ever so slightly, as if bracing against a wind only she could feel. The way her fingers would linger on the edge of things—doorframes, windowsills—not quite holding on, not quite letting go. Her eyes were dark and still, like puddles after rain with nothing reflected in them. She breathed. She walked. She ate when reminded. But living? That had stopped long ago. She didn't cry at night anymore—not because she'd healed, but because even sorrow had grown too heavy for her frayed soul to carry. Dying scared her—but only because she knew what it would do to Ma's face when she found out. So Aahana stayed. Not for herself. Just for that one person who still looked at her like she mattered—even when Aahana couldn't feel it deep down where it counted most. Aahana stepped forward, one foot in front of the other, boots scuffing lightly against the dusty ground.

The man ahead—tall, dressed in a faded denim jacket—was gesturing wildly into his phone, voice sharp with anger: "You don't understand! I'm not taking this anymore!" Aahana didn't care. She barely noticed him at all. Then—

Bang.

Not loud like thunder—but sharp and sudden and real, like the world cracking open. She didn't see it coming. Only felt it—a violent jolt low on her left side near her heart—as if someone had punched straight through bone and muscle with an ice-cold fist.

Her breath hitched—not from pain first... but from surprise. She looked down slowly as crimson bloomed across the gray fabric of her hoodie like ink spreading through paper. Dark at first at center then bleeding outward fast too fast. And still... no pain yet? Not really?

Just warmth seeping down between layers of cloth... a slight pressure... and then—

She lifted her head just as another shot rang out behind her—but missed its target—the man ducked instinctively but wasn't hit—and before he could react further...

—he was already turning to look at her. His eyes widened behind smudged glasses—not rage now—but horror. Regret?

He opened his mouth—as if to say something—to scream "No!"—but no sound came out except breathless panic.

Then he vanished into the crowd like smoke blown by wind.

Chaos erupted instantly—screams tearing through laughter—the scent of blood cutting sharply beneath fried dough and perfume—one second silence after that single gunshot echoing hollowly in ears—and then pandemonium exploded outward from where she stood frozen still standing upright even though she should've fallen already shouldn't have been possible... But she stayed up for a moment longer because shock is strange sometimes—it holds you together long after your body has given up trying to live...

And then Ma turned around—

Ma who had been walking just ahead calling over shoulder earlier: "Aahaan come see this stall!" Now whirling back toward chaos only seeing daughter standing there blood spreading chest face pale not screaming not moving eyes wide blank confused childlike "AHAANA?!"

Time slowed again as Ma ran full force pushing past people ignored everything collapsing onto knees beside daughter's trembling form, pulling gently—oh so gently. A strangled cry tore from her throat.

"No! No no NO!!!"

Tears streamed instantly—uncontrollable sobbing, shaking arms, clutching desperately, against the wound, pressing hand on it, even knowing nothing can stop what's happening inside.

Aahana blinked once looked into mother's soaked face saw every wrinkle deeper now every fear alive there burning. It didn't hurt when bullet entered.

Didn't burn.

Didn't scream...

But seeing this?

Ma breaking apart right before her? Eyes pleading please please stay love my girl don't go

Hands slick red begging for heartbeat to keep going one more time one more beat—

Aahana shut her eyes tightly, unable to bear the sight of her mother's weeping. She could still hear her mother's voice, raw and filled with anguish.

Aahana went unconscious.

Aahana slowly regained consciousness. Her eyes were still closed, but she could hear it—the steady beep... beep... beep of a monitor, the rush of footsteps down a hallway, and then... an eerie silence that wrapped around her like fog.

She opened her eyes. Above her—a white ceiling. Bright. Sterile. Cold.

She blinked, disoriented, then turned her head slightly—taking in the room. Machines lined the wall. Tubes snaked from under sheets that weren't moving.

And there—by the bed—her mother sat hunched forward in a stiff plastic chair, face buried in trembling hands, shoulders shaking with quiet sobs. Relatives stood close around her—consoling her.

Aahana stared at them all.

Then reached out weakly with one hand toward Ma—fingers trembling just above the air between them—as if trying to touch without making contact.

"Ma..." she whispered—but no one turned. No one heard.

She tried again—"Ma!" stronger this time—but still nothing—

So Aahana clenched her jaw and gathered every bit of strength left inside what felt like not quite a body anymore—and pushed herself up off whatever invisible weight held her down...

Her feet touched cold linoleum floor—not warm blood or dust from earlier—and step by unsteady step, she walked over to where they were all gathered.

Aahana sat beside Ma on that chair—but Ma didn't move, didn't flinch, didn't react—

"Mom..." Aahana said softly right beside ear voice cracking "look... I'm okay now... stop crying..."

Still nothing—

"Ma..." louder this time, pleading, "look at me—I'm here—I'm alright!"

But Mom kept weeping fingers clutching tissue soaked through grief-stricken face staring blankly ahead except when someone gestured toward bed.

And then...

Aahana followed their gaze—Saw herself lying motionless on white sheets.

Skin pale.

Chest still.

Monitor showing nothing but straight line across screen—one continuous tone cutting through silent room like knife with the beeeeeeeeep sound

Her breath caught—or would have if she could breathe anymore—

Eyes widened in horror as reality struck deep:

No pulse in wrist.

No warmth left behind skin.

Couldn't feel cold floor beneath bare feet now because those weren't hers anymore?

Was this real?

Was she dead?

Then why was she still speaking?

Still thinking?

Still begging for someone to see...

She looked back at Mom—who cried so hard it sounded like pieces of heart breaking off one by one...

"I'm here!"

"I'M HERE!"

But nobody saw anything but loss, and silence, and love too heavy for words...

And suddenly—it hurt more than any bullet ever could:

Being alive enough to care...

but gone enough that no one knew you stayed behind trying desperately just to be seen again.

And then Aahana understood.

She wasn't in the bed because she wasn't in a body anymore.

She was beside it. Around it. Above it—yet still tethered, like a breath caught mid-exhale, like a name whispered after the lights go out.

She looked down at her own lifeless hand on the sheet—fingers slightly curled as if still reaching for something—and realized:

she was no longer flesh. No longer warmth or pulse or weight. She was memory now. Echo.

And yet... she could think.

Could feel.

Could love—

More fiercely than ever before, standing invisible beside the woman who raised her in quiet mornings and packed lunches and unspoken worries behind tired eyes.

But love without a voice is wind through an empty room—felt only by those who remember what used to be there.

Aahana reached again—not to touch, but to stay—to hold onto Ma even though arms passed through air like mist through fingers—

I'm here,

I never left,

I didn't want to hurt you... But Ma couldn't hear—not with ears made for living sounds.

So Aahana stayed—for that last look at her mother's face beneath hospital fluorescents—the sobs softer now, exhausted grief settling into silence heavier than stone...

And in that moment?

Death didn't feel like darkness falling—It felt like waking up too late—like standing outside your own house with all the lights on, knowing everyone you love is inside, calling your name, but you can't turn the knob anymore... Like being smoke clinging to skin long after fire dies:

not gone.

not alive.

just... loving beyond shape, beyond sound, beyond reach—and so close they almost felt you breathe against their neck when they wept alone that night... but not quite.

Not ever again.

Creativity finds its purest expression when words flow from the heart. Palak Sharma, a student of BBA Semester I, has beautifully showcased this spirit through her inspiring short story that gently unfolds the many shades of life. The story inspires readers to pause and reflect on their own journeys, reminding them that life is a continuous process of learning and self-discovery. With simple yet powerful language, Palak conveys the message that every challenge carries a lesson and every moment holds meaning. Her work beautifully captures the essence of hope, resilience, and inner growth. Palak's short story stands as a fine example of young creativity and expressive writing, and we appreciate her effort and imagination.

Traversing through the corridors of the House that rules the Nation

An NSS Educational Visit to the Parliament of India

On 13th November 2025, the NSS Volunteers of Srinath University were privileged to visit the Parliament of India—an institution that stands as the very foundation of the nation's democratic governance. This educational visit was not merely a tour of a historic building, but a deeply enriching experience that offered valuable lessons in discipline, responsibility, and civic consciousness.

From the moment the volunteers entered the Parliament premises, they witnessed discipline in its most refined and purposeful form. The structured security protocols, punctuality of proceedings, and the dignified conduct of Members of Parliament reflected how discipline functions as the backbone of a successful democracy. Every movement within the complex followed a well-defined order, reinforcing the idea that national progress is sustained through adherence to rules and mutual respect.

For the NSS Volunteers of Srinath University, the visit became a living classroom where discipline was learned not through instruction, but through observation and experience. It emphasized that disciplined citizens are the pillars of a strong nation and that self-regulation, commitment to duty, and respect for institutions are integral to social development.

This memorable visit strengthened the volunteers' resolve to imbibe discipline in their academic, personal, and social lives. It also reaffirmed the NSS motto, "Not Me, But You," by reminding them that disciplined service and responsible citizenship are essential for nation-building. The Parliament visit thus emerged as a transformative experience—one that will continue to inspire the volunteers to serve society with integrity, discipline, and dedication.

Srinath University takes immense pride in the accomplishments of its research scholars and is committed to fostering a culture of academic excellence. The university actively encourages scholars to explore innovative ideas, participate in national and international conferences, and contribute to cutting-edge research across disciplines. This edition highlights the remarkable achievements of our researchers, showcasing their dedication, intellect, and contribution to the global academic community.

Srinath University continues to strengthen its research ecosystem by actively encouraging scholars to engage with national and international academic platforms. Reflecting this commitment, research scholar Suparna Roy Mahato, guided by Dr. Sudarshana Banerjee, has successfully presented her research work at several prestigious conferences and seminars across reputed institutions. She showcased her papers at international and national conferences including ASSICS 2025 at Birla Institute of Technology, Mesra; EPAE 2025, Poland focusing on advanced energy and environmental protection; WASTEEM 2025 at NIT Jamshedpur; and academic seminars organized by professional bodies such as the Indian Institute of Metals, Jamshedpur Chapter.

Her research presentations, particularly in emerging areas like sustainable energy, materials science, and environmental technologies, received appreciation from experts and peers. Such achievements highlight Srinath University's strong focus on research, innovation, and scholarly development. By providing mentorship, exposure, and academic support, especially through guidance from esteemed faculty like Dr. Sudarshana Banerjee, the university empowers its researchers to contribute meaningfully to scientific progress and global knowledge exchange.

The Sacred Journey of Chhath Puja

Day 1

Nahay-Khay: The Beginning of Purity

Day 2

Kharna: A Ritual of Discipline & Gratitude

Nahay-Khay: The Beginning of Purity

Chhath Puja begins with Nahay-Khay, a day dedicated to cleansing and sanctity. Devotees take a holy bath and prepare a pure, satvik meal — often rice, bottle gourd (lauki) cooked in ghee, and chana dal. The kitchen becomes a sacred space, and this simple, unadulterated meal marks the start of the vrat (fast). Nahay-Khay symbolizes entering the festival with a purified body, mind, and soul.

In Jamshedpur, Chhath Puja is not just a religious ritual; it is a festival that brings the entire community together. Days before the festival, people come together to clean riverbanks, prepare ghats, and decorate the surroundings, turning these spaces into vibrant centres of collective devotion. As the sun rises and sets, thousands of devotees gather with offerings in hand to offer aragh to Surya Dev, filling the air with faith, chants, and quiet reverence. The Swarnarekha and Kharkai river ghats, Domuhani Ghat, and Dimna Lake transform into sacred landscapes during this time. Equally captivating is the grand celebration at Surya Mandir, Sidhgora, where Chhath Puja is observed with remarkable devotion and scale, reflecting the deep cultural roots and unity that define the festival in the city.

Kharna: A Ritual of Discipline & Gratitude

The second day, Kharna, reflects deep discipline and devotion. After observing a strict day-long fast without water, devotees prepare a sacred prasad — gur ki kheer (jaggery rice pudding), rice chapati (roti), and bananas. This offering is first dedicated to the divine and then shared with neighbors and family as a symbol of harmony. After this meal, the rigorous 36-hour nirjala fast begins, demonstrating extraordinary spiritual strength.

Sandhya Arghya: The Evening Offering to the Setting Sun

As dusk paints the sky in golden and crimson shades, devotees gather at riverbanks or water bodies to offer Sandhya Arghya to the setting sun. The traditional soop (woven bamboo tray) is filled with offerings like thekua, seasonal fruits, sugarcane, coconuts, and diyas. Standing in waist-deep water, devotees pour arghya from brass lotas, expressing gratitude for life, energy, and well-being. The glowing lamps and collective prayers create one of the most breathtaking scenes of the festival.

In our Shakshatkar segment, Sam Sinha, CEO of The Lead Box and Exogenous Technology, a B2B Marketing and Sales Transformation company, shares his valuable insights on marketing innovation, sales pipeline optimization, and business growth in the digital era. With over 16 years of experience in marketing, sales, and business development, he highlights the importance of scalable digital solutions, data-driven strategies, and customer-centric approaches for sustainable success. His journey reflects a strong commitment to empowering businesses, mentoring entrepreneurs, and contributing to the startup ecosystem, making his perspective both inspiring and insightful for aspiring professionals and young entrepreneurs.

Q As the CEO of The Lead Box and Exogenous Technology, how do you define success in the rapidly evolving B2B digital marketing landscape?

A For B2B, success is built on three pillars: trust, accountability, and sharp brand positioning. Success for me means being obsessively customer-centric, keeping our clients consistently ahead of their competition at the best possible operational cost, and building long-term relationships where we are seen as a strategic growth partner—not just a vendor.

Q In your experience, what are the most common challenges businesses face in sales pipeline optimization, and how can they overcome them?

A Sales pipelines usually break down because of false commitments, over-inflated projections, and limited real engagement with prospects. To overcome this, organisations need disciplined qualification, honest forecasting, and multi-touch nurturing where sales is not just about pushing a product, but about selling a vision, creating hope, and demonstrating that you are the most reliable partner in the customer's success journey.

Q You are actively involved in fostering collaborative ecosystems and contributing to Jharkhand start-ups. What role do regional start-up ecosystems play in India's innovation story?

A Regional start-up ecosystems act as integrators that connect local talent, capital, and institutions, enabling cross-border collaboration from smaller cities to national and global markets. They help shape better regional policies, create strong founder networks, and give local start-ups a platform to be discovered, funded, and showcased on the global stage, which is critical for a diverse country like India.

Q As someone open to volunteering for education, human rights, and child welfare, how do you see corporate leaders contributing meaningfully to social responsibility?

A Meaningful social responsibility starts when leaders move beyond CSR as a checkbox and take courageous, sustained ownership of specific causes. To me, it means becoming a strong pillar in movements around education, dignity, and safety for children and vulnerable communities—much like how leaders such as Ratan Tata consistently combined business excellence with a deep commitment to social impact.

Q What advice would you give to aspiring youths seeking successful careers in marketing, sales, or entrepreneurship in the digital era?

A Entrepreneurship is not a "wow factor" or a social media tag; it is a long-term commitment where you are willing to lose your comfort to build something that truly matters. Marketing and sales are an art: tools are just the brush and canvas, but what differentiates you is your experience, vision, and ideas—so stay curious, stay disciplined, and be ready to consistently step out of your comfort zone.

WORDS OF WISDOM

Q What daily habits or practices have contributed most to your personal and professional growth?

A For me, one of the most important habits has been protecting dedicated "me time" every day. Learning to enjoy my own company, reflect honestly, and treat myself as a true partner in my journey has helped me make better decisions, stay grounded, and grow both personally and professionally.

Q In your opinion, what ethical responsibilities do marketers and entrepreneurs hold in the digital age?

A Marketers and entrepreneurs have a responsibility to be transparent with clients and audiences, share real data, and avoid over-promising in the pursuit of short-term wins. Ethics in the digital age means using data responsibly, communicating honestly, and designing strategies that genuinely serve the customer's interests while building long-term trust.

Q Looking ahead, what is your vision for Exogenous Technology, and how do you hope to inspire the next generation of business leaders?

A The vision for Exogenous Technology is to become a leading digital transformation partner for enterprise brands, delivering best-in-class solutions and services with an integrated AI-driven approach to generate high, measurable ROI for our clients. By building a culture of integrity, innovation, and customer obsession, the aim is to inspire the next generation of leaders to build companies that are both technologically advanced and deeply human-centric.

NSS Club of Srinath University: Transforming Lives Through Service and Social Commitment

At Srinath University, Jamshedpur, the National Service Scheme (NSS) Club stands as a dynamic platform that bridges academic learning with social responsibility. Guided by the motto "Not Me, But You," the NSS Club has consistently worked towards community development, with a strong focus on nutrition awareness, rural education, women's health, and safety.

One of the flagship initiatives of the NSS Club has been its nutrition awareness programmes in rural and semi-urban areas surrounding Jamshedpur. NSS volunteers actively engaged with local communities to educate families about balanced diets, child nutrition, anemia prevention, and affordable nutritious food options. Through interactive sessions, poster campaigns, and demonstrations, the volunteers addressed malnutrition and promoted healthier lifestyle choices, particularly among children and women.

In the field of rural education, the NSS Club organized learning support activities for underprivileged children. Volunteers conducted basic literacy classes, career awareness sessions, and motivational talks in nearby villages. By distributing study materials and encouraging school enrollment, the NSS Club played a meaningful role in reducing educational gaps and inspiring first-generation learners to continue their studies.

The NSS Club has also been deeply committed to women's health and safety awareness. Health camps, menstrual hygiene awareness sessions, and discussions on reproductive health were organized in collaboration with medical professionals and local health workers. Additionally, self-defense awareness, legal rights education, and safety sensitization programmes empowered women with knowledge and confidence to protect themselves and assert their rights.

Beyond structured programmes, NSS volunteers actively participated in social surveys, cleanliness campaigns, and community interaction drives, developing empathy, leadership, and a sense of civic duty. Through these initiatives, the NSS Club of Srinath University has not only contributed to social welfare but has also nurtured socially conscious and responsible citizens, reinforcing the university's commitment to nation-building through service.

Skill is the New Degree

In the evolving world of employment, marks no longer define potential — skills do.

Today's recruiters don't begin with the question,

"Which college did you graduate from?"

They begin with,

"What value can you bring from day one?"

At Srinath University, education goes beyond classrooms. We cultivate job-ready professionals through a structured ecosystem that integrates: Industry-aligned technical skills, Essential soft skills, Practical exposure and real-world application.

Our holistic Technical & skill development framework ensures that every graduate is not just qualified, but confident, competent, and workplace-ready.

Because in today's competitive landscape, skills create careers.

When Nature Meets Art : Eco Print Workshop at Srinath University

ECO PRINT WORKSHOP
6TH NOVEMBER 2025

The School of Fine Arts, Srinath University, successfully conducted Day 1 of the Eco Print Workshop, highlighting the beautiful intersection of nature, sustainability, and artistic expression. The workshop was led by esteemed guest Ms. Trishna Das from Kala Bhavana, Visva Bharati University, who guided students through the principles and practices of eco-friendly art. The hands-on session allowed students to experiment with leaves, petals, and natural textures, transforming them into creative eco prints. Through this experience, participants learned how nature itself can serve as a powerful medium of expression.
